David Hicks’ detention in Guantanamo Bay since December 2001 has attracted significant public interest in Australia. It has raised broad concerns about the balance between national security and legal protection in the context of the “war on terror”. As David Hick’s defence lawyer since November 2003, Major Mori is in a unique position to assess these concerns.

In this lecture, Major Mori will reflect on the law’s capacity to protect due process and principles of fairness in a national and international political environment where the appropriate balance between ‘rights’ and ‘security’ is deeply contested. The particular challenges that such an environment poses for legal advocates will be considered. Major Mori will examine whether the new Military Commissions Act, which was signed by President Bush on 17 October 2006, provides the framework for a fair trial for David Hicks and other Guantanamo Bay detainees.

This public lecture is the final event of the 2006 Australasian Law and Society Conference which is being held from 13-15 December at the University of Wollongong. The theme of the conference is “Right or Racket?: The Protection of Law”. Major Mori’s address is one of three public events being held in conjunction with the conference.
