A real passion for community

By SAM HALL

KERRY Kytka-Brooke repaid from personal experience when he encouraged graduates at the University of Wollongong to get back to their communities.

The father of four who was admitted to hospital with a severe case of hepatitis and later recovered someone’s organ

Six years ago, he decided to turn his life around and start volunteering with the Salvation Army. Since then, he has been volunteering at the Salvation Army every fortnight.

Kytka-Brooke said the students at the University of Wollongong should do the same.

"If you don't get engaged in your community, there's no point in going to university," he said.

Kytka-Brooke was also the president of the University of Wollongong’s student union during his time there.

International flavour adds to double degree honour

By SAM HALL

SARAH Fusco’s road to graduation was long and winding, with a Bachelors in and as a family.

"I just wanted to enjoy the journey and when an opportunity came, do as many things as we could to towards the end of the summer," Fusco said.

Fusco insisted the hard work of the past three years and now being able to get started in the professional world.

SARAH Fusco’s road to graduation was long and winding, with a Bachelors in Commerce and Media Studies.

"I just wanted to enjoy the journey and when an opportunity came, do as many things as we could to towards the end of the summer," Fusco said.

Fusco insisted the hard work of the past three years and now being able to get started in the professional world.